Perceptions about Medication-Assisted Treatment

Addiction need not be a life sentence. Individuals in need of treatment for substance use disorders often experience adversity when trying to incorporate medications into their treatment regimen. Some individuals perceive the use of prescribed medication as another form of substance abuse, simply replacing one drug with another. The use of medication to treat substance use disorders is just like using medication to treat other chronic health conditions like asthma, diabetes, or hypertension – it must occur under the supervision of a prescribing physician and involve FDA-regulated prescription medications. Others are hesitant to use medication as part of their treatment and recovery plan because they mistakenly believe that such use violates the tenets of 12-Step groups, like Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous. In fact, the program literature of these organizations endorse the importance of maintaining good physical health and complying with all physician orders, including the use of prescribed medications.

Knowledge at work for you

MAT is an evidence-supported treatment

Current research demonstrates that prolonged use of drugs or alcohol causes long-term and potentially irreversible changes to various parts of the body, including the brain. MAT medications work by blocking the desirable effects that the substance has upon our nervous system, reducing the craving sensations that individuals often experience early in their recovery, or by creating a physically uncomfortable sensation when an individual uses alcohol. All medications used in treating individuals with substance use disorders have been rigorously evaluated by the FDA and found to be effective when used properly, under the supervision of a prescribing physician, and when provided in conjunction with counseling and other supportive services.

While this brochure primarily includes treatment programs, be aware many private physicians prescribe buprenorphine. Due to the large volume of providers certified to prescribe buprenorphine, they cannot all be listed in this brochure.
